

THE SECRET OF BODY

Any oil may have the "feel" of the right body at ordinary temperatures, but the important question is this: Can it hold its body at cylinder heat? Is it stable at heat where body is needed?

This stability is a natural property—no process of refining, compression, "cutting," or filtration can "manufacture" it into an oil. It must be in the original crude stock. That is why we use costly paraffine crudes in making

Polarine

These oils have what is known as a paraffine base. Paraffine oils have the natural property which gives them a good lubricating body at cylinder heat. We could buy crudes cheaper than paraffine crudes. The oil would look just as good in the can. It would feel just as good between the fingers. But it would not stand under the heat in the cylinder.

The expensive stock used in Polarine makes it cost much more to produce, perhaps a little more to buy. But it makes Polarine the cheapest oil to the user in the end. Polarine is the standard oil for all motors.

The Fascination of the Sea.

In the August Woman's Home Companion Anne Bryan McCall, writing a "Tower Room Talk" about the sea, gives in the following passage some impression of the fascination of the sea:

"It is just in its persistently remote levelness, in its unbroken depths, in its far-off horizons which forever recede from you as you approach them, in its limitless spaces, its mysterious tides—it is in these things that abide, for me, its infinite beauty and its great and peculiar restfulness. You may come to land's end, but never to sea's end. Let the land rise up, however frowning, mountain high, to stop it, but the sea flows around 'though it be ten thousand miles,' and contrives still to hold the great countries in its mighty arms. It borders all, surrounds all, connects all shores, and the old lady of whom Emerson tells, who had to pinch and economize all her life and then at last saw the sea, and rejoiced, because there was 'enough of it,' here is enough for all our needs, and to spare. Here is something not to be exhausted, here something which dwells the oldest and greatest of man's monuments, on whose shore we dwindle, as it were, to mere pin points of existence, and know more reasonably our own proportions; and in that lies its great comfort.

"For this is at heart, I believe, the source of that sense of strength and restfulness which the sea so habitually imparts to those who go to it for contemplation or refreshment. Here, in the presence of such vastness, we can forget the personal and the trivial. Here, far from the towns and cities of our lives, it would seem we may abandon our faults and leave our mistakes far inland."
